Description of a supermarket

From outside, the supermarket towers over every other building around it. It's huge sign sticks out in the skyline in big, almost crudely so, bold letters that scream the word, 'ASDA' to every living thing in the area. The people create a sea of business streaming in and out like a swarm of ants scurrying to their queen that is 'commercialisation'.

As you walk inside the store, a plethora of aisles face you, holding their good out to you, willing you to pick them up and take them home. Directly opposite the doors is a paradise that is the 'fruit and vegetables' section. This section of the store is the rainbow. The colours, perfectly aligned in shades of all colours; making it a pleasure to the eye. Fruit and vegetables of all kinds are on offer. The regular everyday carrots, potatoes and broccoli, but hidden amongst them are jewels of mother nature that are maybe not so common. The Dragon Fruit with it's almost unnatural pink and spikes surrounding its shell, fascinates onlookers; the berries of all kinds fill the shelves in all shapes and sizes decorating the section like tiny baubles on a Christmas tree.

Deeper into the store, in the belly of its existence, lies the most magical section- the bakery. This section is not for the bold and the brave. The senses are overwhelmed, the imagination set alight by the deep smells of fresh-out-the oven bread, the colours of the cakes adding flecks of bright colour amongst the golden brown. The bakery's admirers linger at the end of the aisle, taking in the beauty of the crusty rolls and orangey-golden crust of the Tiger Loaf. As the smells become too much, the senses overloaded, they tip-toe closer, deeper into the bakery's grip. Each shopper looks sheepish lingering by the pastries, their excuse of a 'cheat day' or 'it's been a long week' almost audible as they lick their lips and rake through the shelf for the creamiest eclairs.
